FOREST AND RAINFALL.

MPORTANT ACTIONS WHICH AFFECT LAND AND SEA.

The First Result When Land is Destitute of Forests-Another Important Result-Beautiful Phenomena-Erosio

The tangle of decayed vegetation which overs the ground beneath the forest is of onsiderable thickness. On top it consists al ogether of the decayed trunks, branches and eaves, but it shades downward into ordi dark colored soil at the depth of a few fee from the surface. This, the decay zone of the forest, lies between the boughs of the air and the branches of the roots. In it go on he most important actions which take place in our forests-actions which affect the his tory of land and sea. We shall therefore have to consider it in a somewhat painstaking caying wood, and moss which feeds on the lecay, is on the rainfall of the region which t mantles. When, after a season of drought copious rain falls on this spongy mass, the water is for a long time absorbed in the in-terstices, and does not flow to the rivers. Even in times of very heavy rain the water is slowly yielded to the streams; after a dry period of many weeks this sponge retains a good share of water. A like amount of rain falling on tilled fields or prairies slips quickly away to the rivers and thence to the sea. The first result is that when the land is destitute of forests it sheds water like house roofs, breeding floods after every considerable rain, while in the forests the rain is only slowly vielded to the streams.

ANOTHER IMPORTANT RESULT. A second and less evident result of th spongy character of the forest bed is that, by hindering the escape of the rain water to the rivers, it increases the actual rainfall of the country. To see the nature and importance of this action we must turn aside for a moment to consider the origin of the rain which falls upon the land. The original source of this water supply is the sea, which sends into the lands a tolerably regular annual store of noisture. When this falls as rain or snow, either of two things may happen-the water may go away directly to the sea or it may return to the atmosphere as vapor to be again precipitated as rain. The chance of its re-evaporation is determined by the speed with which it flows to the streams. From a treeess region it rapidly escapes; in an extensive district of virgin forest it may again and again pass from earth to air, and from air to earth. The columns of vapor, which in times of summer rain may be seen ascending from every great wood, afford visible evidence of the effect of forests on rainfall. They also may show the observer some of the most beau-In a summer rain shower the air above the trees becomes much cooler than it is in the reesses below their tents of foliage. This heated air within the woods seeks to rise and escapes in great columns wherever there is attains the cooler level above the moisture condensed, and the air, before transparent, becomes charged with steam. To replathis ascending air a broad current drifts toward the emerging streams of vapor, com-monly from the higher parts of the forest, where the air, owing to the elevation of the site, is cooler than in the lower levels.

EROSION OF THE SOIL. This repeated passage of the moisture from earth to cloud and from cloud to earth greatly increases the amount of force which the rain applies in its falling drops to the earth's surface; but the rank vegetation protects the surface from the erosion which it would hillsides of the Cumberland mountains, where the soil lies on declivities of great steepness, suffer little wear as long as their natural protection is left to them. But as soon as they are stripped of the garment of wood which has been upon the region ever since, in the far off ages, they came from the depths of the sea, they wear with great rapidity. The erosion is limited, as long as they are forest clad, to the stream beds, and there is hindered trees and entangled driftwood. The brooks which are strong enough to clear their beds and cut into the earth and rock flatter ground, find tracts of a square mile or more in area in which there is not a single stream that ever assails the surface of the stream that ever assails the surface of the stream that ever assails the forest mat are few in number; we may often, on the channels; they often, on the deforested surface, increase 100 fold in their length and more than that measure in their destructive power. Relieved of all restraint from fallen timber, or the close knit roots which enmesh the earth, they sweep the precious soil away toward the sea. In a single day a tilled field may lose from its surface more soil than would be taken from it in a century of its forest state. - Scribner's Magazine.

President Garfield in Congress. When I went into congress the war was still raging. I wanted to go back into the army. After Rosecraus' removal, Thomas, who was avery dear friend of mine, was exceedingly auxious to have me come back, and tendered me in a private letter the command of an army corps if I would go. He had become the head of the whole army, you know. I very much wanted to go back, but Mr. Lingely much wanted to go back, but Mr. Li coin made a personal point [of my taking my soat in the house of representatives]. In the first place, he said that the Republican ma-jority in congress was very small, and there was great doubt whether we could certainly carry the necessary measures; and, in the next place, he was greatly lacking in men of military experience in the house to regulate the legislation about the army. So I went in, and was immediately put upon the mili-

In time of peace ways and means and ap-propriations are the most important of the committees, and the military is rather a decoration than an influential committee. But in the war the military committee was way up above any others in importance, and my po-sition on it, as practically acquainted with the wants of the army, called me into immediate requisition, giving me a promithe wants of the army, called me into immediate requisition, giving me a prominate requisition, giving me a prominate requisition, giving me a prominate of light housekeeping, inference expenses in the house in the beginning that I named in the house in the beginning that I could not possibly have had in any other way. The first speech I made was on the 26th of January, 1864, on a bill for the confiscation of rebel property. There are portions of that which you will probably think it best to print, enough, at least, to show the swing of my mind and the character of my speaking. I was the youngest member in either branch of congress at that time, as I had been the youngest member of the Ohio legislature, and the youngest brigadier general in the army.
